(http://i1.wp.com/forthecountryrecord.com/wp-content/uploads/2015/05/bryan-hayes.jpg)Memphis-based country rock musician Bryan Hayes has been plugging away for years, and it seems like people are gradually beginning to notice. After releasing a couple of albums and achieving regional popularity in the mid-south, Bryan's music career got put on hold for two years when he was deployed to Iraq in 2009. However, as things started winding down and he prepared to return home, he picked up the guitar again and remembered his love of music and songwriting. When he was back in the US, Bryan took inspiration from the likes of Guy Clark and John Prine and recorded an EP ('Tangle Me Up In You') and a full-length album ('Still Just A Man… 10 Years Later'). Both were well-received and led to him opening for the likes of Randy Houser, Turnpike Troubadours and Billy Joe Shaver.

Now, Bryan is gearing up to release a brand new album entitled 'Farther Down The Line' (due May 26th), alongside his day job of being a producer and engineer at Farmhouse Recording Studio in Moscow, Tennessee. With a new approach to straight-talking in his songs that allows a more "real" representation of life and all it offers, Bryan finds himself on the brink of something great. His lead single 'I Wanna Run' takes much influence from the heartland stadium rock pioneered by Springsteen and his peers, and is a great empowering track about chomping at the bit to get out there. It's perfect for summertime driving and is accompanied by a video that follows Bryan gradually travelling in his car until he reaches a pier at night, decorated in gorgeous fairy lights and surrounded by all the people that love him. It fades out with footage of him performing with a band on the pier.

About Vickye
I run this joint. Country music blogger extraordinaire, fangirling, coffee drinking and Twittering on a far-too-regular basis. Loves bunnies, high heels and other girly things, notorious for pissing off country artists and generally being bluntly honest about everything. Feminist and chatty person.
